Mr. Obama has come under renewed criticism since the Paris attacks for lacking an effective strategy to defeat the Islamic State. He pledged Tuesday with French President Francois Hollande to step up joint strikes against the extremist group, and both leaders urged other coalition members to contribute more resources to the military campaign.

A Pentagon spokesman said previously that the coalition wanted to "cripple" the extremist group's oil distribution capabilities but didn't want to destroy the region's oil producing infrastructure completely because it will be needed by the inhabitants after the Islamic State is eventually defeated.

The extremist group is believed to generate nearly half a billion dollars annually from oil revenue. The Pentagon showed videos earlier this month of coalition attacks on oil fields controlled by the Islamic State, including strikes against oil and gas plants and an oil field in the Deir Ezzour province in eastern Syria.
