Yet another argument for source code (Score:3)

Yet another argument showing why it is better to favour software with visible source code. Not that the "CPU" is "dust" in it that miraculously repel this kind of abuse.

completely free/libre opensource software, this kind of analysis would have been much easier and could happen much earlier (and you would expect de-spyware-ified forks to pop-up on github at the same time as such disclosure).

Source code doesn't help unless you have a surefire way to guarantee that the binary you're running was built exactly from that source code. And if the binary has dependencies on other libraries then the same applies to them. And the compiler toolchain. And if the binary executes html content or scripts, potentially fetched from the web then even that doesn't prevent potential abuse.

You know, Callahan's is a peaceable bar, but if you ask that dog what his favorite formatter is, and he says "roff! roff!", well, I'll just have to...
