Outre l'or de Fort Knox, il existe un autre inestimable trésor aux États-Unis: la Strategic Petroleum Reserve, soit la réserve stratégique de pétrole du pays, sur lequel il peut compter lorsque les temps énergétiques se compliquent.

Avec une inflation qui galope et inquiète, un pétrole qui plane près des grandes hauteurs et des prix à la pompe qui font grincer de nombreuses dents à quelques encablures des vacances de Thanksgiving puis de Noël, le prix de l'énergie est devenu une épine dans le pied de nombreux gouvernements et de leur côtes de popularité respectives.

Ils ne pourront compter sur l'aide des pays de l'OPEC+: décidées à ne pas répondre aux suppliques occidentales, les nations productrices de pétroles ont collectivement choisi de ne pas augmenter leur production pour calmer le marché et faire baisser les prix de l'or noir.

Un front s'est donc formé autour des États-Unis, comprenant également l'habituellement rivale Chinois, l'Inde, la Corée du Sud, le Japon et le Royaume-Uni, pour puiser dans les réserves stratégiques de chaque pays et essayer de détendre quelque peu le marché. «Nous agissons», a millions de barils pour l'Inde, et d'un chiffre entre 7 et 15 millions pour la Chine, qui doit encore officiellement procéder à sa propre annonce.

Comme le note Quartz, le fait que le Chine et l'Inde semblent s'associer à la démarche des États-Unis est néanmoins signifiant: les deux pays ne font pas partie de l'Agence Internationale de l'Énergie, et cela montre que les grandes puissances pourraient être désormais déterminées à prendre un peu plus vigoureusement leurs destinées en mains.

Mais comme comme l'ajoute le même site, ce front uni ne fait qu'un poids très relatif face à la toute-puissance des pays de l'OPEC+, dont fait partie une Russie ayant elle aussi fait de l'énergie une redoutable arme géopolitique. Qui n'ont pas tardé à réagir, expliquant en réaction qu'ils laisseraient possiblement tomber de futurs plans d'augmentation de production.
