The Biology Of Baldness

The genetics of baldness is scientifically established. If you have a certain genotype, a genotype that contains the code for going bald, and if you wait long enough, you will go bald. The fact is that going bald is a physical trait similar to eye color, tongue shape or skin tone. Much like you have no control over your original eye color, you have no control whether you end up bald.

Unsound Discrimination

Today's progressive society has recognized that discrimination based on biology is morally unsound. If you have no control over your skin color, why should it be acceptable to discriminate against someone based on skin color? Unfortunately, the same set of morality is not applied to baldness. And baldness is a physical analog to skin color. No one thinks it's wrong to discriminate against the bald man.

Cures for Baldness

Baldness is actually considered a disease in contemporary society. Male pattern baldness is termed "androgenetic alopecia" in the Physician Desk Reference and there are drugs and creams on the market used to "treat" or "cure" going bald. Pharmaceutical companies generate billions of dollars in revenue trying to prevent baldness. Imagine how the progressives in society would feel about someone being told to take a pill to change their skin color.

The Most Beautiful People

The stigma of being a bald man runs deep. That's why so many men pay so much money to try and prevent it. Think about how many movie stars or models have overt male pattern baldness. I just searched IMDB's 100 Most Beautiful People on the Planet and 0% of the people listed had "androgenetic alopecia". Zero. To be genetically bald is not to be beautiful.

Changing Society

What can change this stigma? What can be done to wholesale prevent bald discrimination? Do we need laws to fine people for such discrimination? Do we need quotas for bald men on movie sets? Do we need to demonize women who won't date a bald man for fear that she will have a bald child? What we need are some bald social justice warriors.
