

Sign in Create account

Back

#

Parade du Grotisque
@ParadeGrotisque@mastodon.sdf.org

Got spam today from LinkedIn saying: "You are the best candidate! [large hotel chain] is looking for cleaning maids".

I mean, nothing against cleaning maids, because they do a fantastic job*, but I have the feeling LinkedIn AI is completely b0rked.

Current, official work title: "Cloud Architect".

(* And, by the way, I make sure to always leave a bit of change for them when I leave a hotel, and so should you!)

Jun 27, 2025, 14:50 · Web · 1 · 13

Uilebheist
@Uilebheist@polyglot.city

Jun 27

@ParadeGrotisque That's probably just because if you search for "cleaning maid" on any LLM-infected search engine, you are just as likely to get results for "cleaning maid" as for "cloud architect" (or even "used lawnmower salesperson").

1

Parade du Grotisque
@ParadeGrotisque

Jun 27

@Uilebheist

Top search result is probably "purple rhinoceroses kernel experts", but hey, I'd rather work with a couple of competent rhinoceros than most LLM engineers...

0

jack @jack

Jun 27

@ParadeGrotisque Regarding the cleaning maids, I'm completely with you.

I'm also happy to hear that I'm not the only one with a questionable job title ("DevOps Engineer").

0

Ltning
@ltning@weirdr.net

Jun 28

Reminds me of all those times we were hiring sysadmins for our "hosting organization". And the majority of applicants came from the hospitality industry, despite our ads very clearly using words like FreeBSD and MySQL and titles like Command Line Warrior and stuff..

0

