"Controversy erupts at the plagiarism machine conference when it turned out people were using the plagiarism machine to do plagiarism."

This is genuine comedy.

"Controversy at [technology] [conference] as participants found to be using [technology] at [conference]".

How would that sentence even make sense for any conference or technology that was doing anything worthwhile? Even the NFT people didn't sink to that level of straight up epistemological tail-eating nonsense. What the hell are we even doing here?

@mhoye Update: the accusations of plagiarism machine use were also generated by a plagiarism machine:

@irvingreid they're trying to detect LLM generated content with a classifier. So if you're referring to generative AI as a "plagiarism machine" then no, they aren't using the plagiarism machine for detection. It's really frustrating that everyone just conflates "AI" with generative models like LLMs now. 😞

@mhoye The same nature.com that let this through, seemingly un-reviewed? They've added a tiny update to the top of the page, but the slop is still there.

@xinit @mhoye Yikes!! How did this ever get past peers reviews and the editor? It'd be more comical if it wasn't undermining the scientific method.

@mhoye way back during the mobile and casual games boom, an attendee to the Game Developers Conference remarked on how many of the people from those companies said, basically, "I don't touch the stuff myself" - this would've been when they were inventing various addictive patterns that would later be developed into the modern form that's basically just gambling. so perhaps it's a sign of user-hostile design generally

@mhoye It might shock you to learn that machine learning has many applications beyond [popular consumer product], and that this particular academic conference predates the chatbot craze by about a decade.
