Cecelia Giménez was obviously a bit upset at the reactions to her efforts to restore a painting that meant so much to her. She insisted that the version the world saw and reacted to was never the finished product, that it was a work in progress. Eventually she found some pride in it; tourism dollars generated by the fresco went on to pay for elder care, and Cecelia was paid via merchandising profits.

@infernusgoatus I've worked on a few software projects that ended up looking like that, so I can sympathise.
